A perfect example is found where government does the paying--and it's true of small matters as well as

Oregon, for instance, once used yellow dividing stripes on its highways. These, most motorists found, were easier to see at night and under bad weather conditions. They were distinctive, too, and acted as guides to tourists.

No more. For the federal government is paying most of the costs of major highways--and Uncle Sam says that all highway stripes must be white. Uncle-taxpayer-filled pocketbook in hand-- is the boss.

It's also been proposed, in order to brighten the landscape, that Oregon bridges be painted in bright colors. But Uncle, with his 50-state rule book, wouldn't accept that either.

The point is that handcuffs come with the handouts.
